

THE Chinese have caught on to one "Mepican" idea, and that is the possibility of defeating the law through the forms of law. They do not resist the registry law from any blind, beathen, unreasoning stubbornness. They behave as American citizens would under the same circumstances. They believe the law may be beaten in the courts, or at least that delay may be secured; they have employed counsel and they await the issue. It is not well to underrate the intelligence of people on account of the style in which they wear their hair, or the cut of their eyebrows.
